

About the Existence of God

It takes far more "faith" to believe that the existence of life is due to "accident" and "chance" than to God. If you are an atheist or agnostic, you need a lot of "faith" to accept the theory that life can come from something that has no life, or that something intelligent can be produced from something with no intelligence. From every standpoint, common sense refutes such theories. Today, modern science, and intelligent man cannot create life from something that is dead, nor even bring back to life something that was once living and died. Intelligence comes from intelligence, not from something with no intelligence. And, where is there evidence to be found anywhere that will prove that anything dead can produce life? Indeed, belief that a living God can create life takes a lot less faith than belief that something with no life created life. Placing your faith in the living God makes far more common sense than placing your faith in unproven improbable theories based on accident and chance. Demand proof for such theories, don't just accept them! Believe the obvious truth that a living God created life, not the foolish lie that something with no intelligence created it. When you think about all of this, and what you believe, remember well the infamous words of the atheist, Lenin, who laughingly said, "a lie told long enough becomes the truth."
